Project marketing with sales structure

NOVALURE PLAYBOOK · FOR PROPERTY DEVELOPERS AND PROJECT SALES TEAMS

Why More Project Enquiries Do Not Automatically Sell More Units

Between project presence, campaign and sales, many developments lose exactly what prepares a buying conversation: source, intent, timing and the next step. This playbook shows where that context disappears, what it costs — and how to tell whether your project path produces conversations or sorting work.

RECOGNITION

Do these situations sound familiar?

Developments rarely fail for lack of interest. They fail in what happens between interest and a buying conversation. Three moments from everyday project sales:

SITUATION 1 · MONDAY, 9:10 AM

“Which of these are serious?”

Fourteen enquiries arrived over the weekend: portal, project page, campaign. Your sales team opens the list and asks the only question that matters — and nobody can answer it. So the calls start from the top, in order of arrival rather than readiness to buy.

SITUATION 2 · THE CAMPAIGN REPORT

“It’s working — cost per lead is down.”

The report shows more enquiries at lower cost. At the same time, sales reports that quality has clearly dropped. Both are right — they are simply not measuring the same thing. The campaign is judged on clicks and lead prices before anyone has seen the quality of a single conversation.

SITUATION 3 · THE FIRST CALL

Both sides start from zero.

A prospective buyer downloaded the brochure days ago and asked for an appointment. On the call, he asks about floor plans he already has — and your salesperson asks about budget, timing and preferred unit, all for the first time. Two prepared people would have been discussing the buying decision.

If at least one of these feels familiar, the problem is rarely the marketing and rarely the sales team. It is the path in between — and that path can be made visible.

ECONOMIC FRICTION

What the current way of working really costs

These costs never appear on an invoice, yet they accrue every week — in time, priorities and missed conversations:

Your most expensive people’s time

Your sales team asks on the phone what a well-built enquiry path could have captured long before: intent, timing, budget fit, preferred unit. Selling time turns into sorting time.

The wrong priorities

Without context, the loudest enquiry wins, not the most mature one. The undecided get quick call-backs while ready buyers wait — because both look identical in the same list.

Decisions made blind

Pricing, unit mix and media budget are steered without any insight flowing back from real conversations. The report shows clicks — not what buying decisions are currently failing on.

Opportunities that go quiet

Enquiries without an owner and a dated next step simply sit there. The buyer who wanted to purchase “in six months” is never contacted again — and buys elsewhere.

How large this effect is in money terms depends on project, market and price bracket — so this playbook deliberately quotes no invented figures. The direction is unambiguous: the most expensive minutes of any development are the ones your sales team spends in the wrong conversations — and the ones in which the right conversation never happens.

LEAK MAP

Where context gets lost along the way

A project path has five stations. At every hand-off, the context a prepared buying conversation needs can break. This is the leak map:

01 Project presence → 02 Enquiry → 03 Qualification → 04 Follow-up → 05 Handover

LEAK 1→2

The trigger is lost: which asset, which campaign, which motive produced the enquiry? Without the source, the conversation has no starting point.

LEAK 2→3

The form collects contact details instead of buying context. Timing, budget fit and unit preference have to be asked for later, one call at a time.

LEAK 3→4

No owner, no date. Whether anyone follows up depends on who happens to remember — not on a defined next step.

LEAK 4→5

Sales receives a name and a number instead of a score, source, timing and next step. The first conversation starts from zero.

LEAK 5→1

Insights from conversations never flow back. Campaign and positioning keep being steered by clicks instead of by what buyers actually hesitate over.

Every single station can be well made in itself — page, campaign, sales team. The leaks happen at the hand-offs, which is precisely why one more isolated measure rarely solves the problem.

QUALITY CRITERIA

What a prepared buying conversation must show

“Qualified” is not a feeling — it is a minimum of context. Before your sales team picks up the phone, six things should be visible:

1
Source and trigger. Where did the enquiry come from, and what set it off — brochure, project page, campaign, referral?

2
Unit interest. Which unit type, which size, which position in the scheme? “Interested in the project” is too little for a good conversation.

3
Timing. Buying within zero to three months, three to six — or later? That decides priority and the goal of the call.

4
Budget fit. Does the price bracket broadly fit, is it open, or does it not fit? No credit check — an honest self-assessment is enough to prioritise.

5
Status and open questions. Which documents have been sent, which questions are outstanding? Nothing sent twice, nothing asked twice.

6
A next step with a date and an owner. Call-back, viewing, financing conversation — agreed, scheduled and assigned to one person.

If several of these are routinely missing, that is not a sales problem — it is a handover problem. Your sales team can only prioritise as well as the path before it supplies context.

THE NOVALURE DIFFERENCE

Five principles of a managed project path

NovaLure connects positioning, visualisation, brochure, campaign, qualification, follow-up and handover into one path — instead of lining up isolated services. The difference shows in five principles:

1 One connected path instead of fragmented services
Story, imagery, brochure, campaign and sales tell the same project and pass context forward — instead of losing it at every interface.

2 Context over clicks
What gets measured is what prepares a conversation: source, intent, timing, budget fit. Click prices are an intermediate value — not a measure of success.

3 A personally led process instead of an anonymous funnel
One accountable contact leads the mandate, with a specialist team behind it for visualisation, campaign and sales systems.

4 Prepared conversation openings instead of raw contacts
What gets handed over is a reason to talk — with score, source, timing and an agreed next step. Not a list of names and numbers.

5 Feedback from sales instead of a campaign report
What becomes visible in conversations — objections, unit preferences, price reactions — flows back into positioning, media and prioritisation.

Behind the scenes, NovaLure uses an internal operating system to keep source, context, ownership, follow-up and the next step connected. You are not buying software — you are buying the outcome of a managed process: prepared conversations, structured handling and a documented handover to your existing sales team. Your agent or in-house team is prepared, not replaced.

MINI SCORECARD

Where does your project path stand?

Eight questions, three possible answers. Answer honestly — what counts is the normal week, not the best case.

#	Question	Yes	Partly	No
1	For every enquiry, do you know which asset or campaign triggered it?	☐	☐	☐
2	Does your sales team know timing and budget fit before the first call?	☐	☐	☐
3	Is unit interest (type, size, position) captured before the first conversation?	☐	☐	☐
4	Does every open enquiry have one clearly responsible person?	☐	☐	☐
5	Does every open enquiry have a dated next step?	☐	☐	☐
6	Are brochure enquiries treated differently from viewing requests?	☐	☐	☐
7	Do insights from sales conversations flow back into campaign and pricing?	☐	☐	☐
8	Can you see demand per unit type across all channels?	☐	☐	☐

7–8 × Yes

Your path carries the weight. This is about fine-tuning — for example sharpening the feedback loop from sales.

4–6 × Yes

The path has structural gaps. Individual stations are fine; the hand-offs are costing you conversations.

0–3 × Yes

The path is fragmented. More media budget here produces one thing above all: more sorting work.

Two or more “No” answers? That is exactly what an outside look at your specific project path is for: Request a Project Check — 30 minutes, no obligation.

EXAMPLE

How a project path changes

This is what the difference looks like in practice — using the example of a new-build scheme of around forty units, with enquiries from portal, project page and campaign:

Before

All enquiries land in one inbox. Sales works the list in order of arrival; viewing slots go to the undecided while ready buyers wait. The campaign is judged on cost per lead and scaled further.

Changed process

Buying context is captured at the point of enquiry: trigger, unit preference, timing, budget fit. Every enquiry gets an owner and a dated next step. Handover happens only with full context; once a week, sales feedback flows back into the campaign.

Result

Fewer, but prepared, conversations. Viewings happen with buying intent, priorities follow maturity instead of gut feeling — and unit mix, price arguments and media are steered by real conversations.

Illustrative example to demonstrate the principle — no client figures and no promise of results. How much a project path improves depends on the project, market, offer and budget.

The decisive point is the order of operations: first the path, then the reach. A path that holds context can process demand — a fragmented one merely converts it into additional work.

PROJECT CHECK

What the Project Check examines

The Project Check is a focused 30-minute video call about one specific project or market area — an assessment, not a sales presentation.

What we look at together

- Project presence and existing assets
- Enquiry routes and the context captured today
- Qualification and prioritisation
- Follow-up structure: ownership and dates
- Handover to your sales team

What you bring

- One specific project or market area
- Your current enquiry sources
- How enquiries are handled today
- The person who can decide

What you take away

- A clear view of your current path
- The two or three biggest bottlenecks
- An assessment of whether a structured build-up makes sense
- One clear next step

What the Check is not

- Not a free end-to-end strategy
- No guaranteed enquiry or sales figures
- Not a finished campaign plan
- Not a software offer

You receive the assessment whether or not a collaboration follows. Afterwards you can have the whole path built, or individual modules — the Check shows where the gap is in your project.

SUMMARY

The next step

1 — More enquiries are not the goal. Prepared buying conversations are the goal — enquiries are merely their raw material.

2 — Context is lost at the hand-offs, not at the stations. Which is why yet another isolated measure — one more campaign, one more tool — falls short.

3 — A path can be tested. Source, intent, timing, ownership, next step: either these are visible — or your sales team pays for their absence with time.

Have your project path checked — in 30 minutes.

No obligation, and concrete: you receive a clear assessment with the two or three biggest levers for your project — not a sales presentation.
