

DEVELOPER PROJECT PLAYBOOK | ENGLISH EDITION

Are your project leads sales-ready, or just contact details?

A diagnostic guide for developers and project sales teams that need buyer conversations with prepared context, not more campaign noise.

Use this playbook to identify where project demand loses quality before sales can act, then decide whether a Project Check is the right next step.

A system, not another marketing folder.

This document is designed as a working guide. Use it to inspect your current setup, reveal gaps and prioritize the next operating steps with more clarity.

Developers with a concrete launch, project or sales pressure

Project sales teams receiving enquiries but missing buyer context

New-build or investment teams that need cleaner prepared handover

Teams considering a structured setup but not yet sure where the leak sits

1. Presence

2. Demand

3. Qualification

4. Handover

The actual problem: enquiries without sales context

Developer campaigns often look active while sales still works manually. The funnel collects names, brochure requests or vague project interest, but the CRM does not explain why this person matters now. More traffic then creates more sorting work instead of more qualified buyer conversations.

- A project enquiry is not sales-ready just because it has a phone number.
- A buyer who likes the architecture may still be far from timing, budget or decision readiness.
- A campaign that reports leads without CRM feedback cannot show where real buyer intent starts.
- If sales has to rebuild the context on every first call, the handover is not doing its job.

Typical project path leaks

Most weak project paths do not fail in one dramatic place. They lose quality in several small handovers: from ad to page, from page to form, from form to handover and from handover to follow-up. The leak is commercial, not cosmetic.

This is where the system loses context - buyer type, timing and readiness never reach sales.

- The page explains the project but not the buying decision.
- The form captures contact details but not project fit, timing or buyer type.
- The CRM record shows a source but not the reason for urgency.
- Follow-up starts the same way for every lead, regardless of readiness.
- Reporting focuses on cost per lead while sales still filters manually.

What a sales-ready project lead must show

A sales-ready project lead gives the first call a useful starting point. It does not need to reveal every detail, but it should show enough context for sales to decide whether to call, how to open the call and what next step makes sense.

- Project or location interest is visible before sales opens the record.
- Buyer type, unit logic or use case is at least directionally clear.
- Timing and budget proximity are not hidden in open notes.
- Source, landing page and requested asset are connected to the record.
- The next step is obvious enough that follow-up can start without guesswork.

Mini scorecard: is the project ready for review?

Ready for review does not mean the system is already strong. It means the business has a concrete enough situation to inspect: project, market pressure, current lead sources, sales process and a real commercial reason to improve lead quality.

- ☐ There is a specific project, launch, stock pressure or market area.
- ☐ Leads already exist, but sales cannot trust or prioritize them cleanly.
- ☐ The CRM or lead management process is visible enough to inspect.
- ☐ Sales can explain which leads waste time and which create real conversations.
- ☐ Budget and decision readiness can be discussed without turning the check into an implementation handover.

Your assessment:

- ☐ 0-2 met -> Clarify the basics first; a check would be premature.
- ☐ 3-4 met -> A Project Check can now reveal where context is being lost.
- ☐ 5 met -> Your funnel produces volume, but not a reliable pipeline. That is exactly what the check is for.

Symptoms worth reviewing, not a full solution

This playbook intentionally stops before a complete blueprint. A serious project path depends on market, offer, assets, sales capacity, system maturity and timing. Generic advice can create activity while the real bottleneck remains untouched.

- High lead volume but low booked-call quality points to weak qualification.
- Many brochure downloads but few serious conversations points to unclear next steps.
- Fast follow-up with poor outcomes points to bad fit, not only bad sales execution.
- Slow follow-up points to ownership, CRM and process gaps.
- Low trust in reports points to missing definitions between marketing and sales.

What a check reveals

A project sales team was receiving steady enquiries through portals and the project site. The bottleneck only became visible when the handover was reviewed: many enquiries reached sales without a clear indication of buyer type, timing or financing proximity. Sales had to rebuild the context in every first conversation. Volume was not the issue. The missing layer between form and first call was.

What the Project Check clarifies

The Project Check is not a strategy workshop in disguise. It is a focused review of where the current project path loses commercial quality before sales can act.

- Where project demand enters the system and where context is lost.
- Whether the landing page and lead asset attract the right buyer type.
- Whether intent filtering protects sales time or only adds friction.
- Whether the handover gives sales enough context for the first call.
- Whether follow-up and reporting can support ongoing improvement after launch.

When the Project Check fits and when it does not

The check is useful when there is a real project, sales pressure and willingness to improve the path from visibility to conversation. It is not useful when the goal is only to collect loose ideas, demand fixed lead numbers or avoid follow-up discipline.

- Fit: active project, launch pressure, internal sales ownership and budget readiness.
- Fit: existing lead sources that produce volume but not enough usable context.
- No fit: no concrete project, no sales ownership or no willingness to support structured follow-up and handover.
- No fit: expectation of fixed lead numbers or a full campaign blueprint from an introductory call.

Clear next step: review the project path

If the scorecard exposed a real gap, the useful next step is not another generic checklist. It is a 30-minute review of the current path and a decision on whether a structured setup is commercially sensible.

- Use the check to test whether the system is missing project clarity, qualification or prepared handover.
- Bring one concrete project, market area or lead-quality problem.
- Prepare the current lead sources, handover process and biggest sales bottleneck.
- Expect a clear assessment, not a handed-over implementation plan.

Have your current project path reviewed.

30 minutes, one concrete project or lead source that currently creates friction. We review project presence, lead qualification, handover and follow-up, then give you a clear assessment of where your system loses context and whether a structured setup makes commercial sense. No pitch, no operations manual handed over for nothing. A diagnosis you can use to decide for yourself.
