

NOVALURE PLAYBOOK · FOR ESTATE AGENTS AND BROKERAGE TEAMS

From Portal Enquiry to a Prepared Seller or Buyer Conversation

Portals deliver contacts — not conversations. This playbook shows why valuation curiosity is so often mistaken for an intention to sell, where seller and buyer enquiries lose context, and how owned demand becomes prepared reasons to talk instead of one more list to work through.

RECOGNITION

Do these situations sound familiar?

Most agencies do not have a contact problem. They have a context problem — and it shows up every day. Three examples:

SITUATION 1 · THE VALUATION ENQUIRY“I just wanted to know what it’s worth.”

A homeowner requests an online valuation. You receive the enquiry, call, have a pleasant forty-minute conversation — and afterwards you still do not know whether this property will be sold in any foreseeable timeframe. Curiosity and an intention to sell look identical in the inbox.

SITUATION 2 · THE PORTAL BUYERTwenty questions — or no reply at all.

A buyer enquiry via the portal: name, number, “please contact me”. No search area, no budget, no motivation, no timeframe. Either an interview begins on the phone — or the enquiry sits unanswered, because fifteen others arrived that look exactly like it.

SITUATION 3 · THE OLD CONTACTThe property sold — just not with you.

An owner who said “maybe next year” eight months ago has now sold. Through another agency. The follow-up lived in one person’s head, and that person was on holiday. Nobody did anything wrong — there was simply no dated next step.

All three situations share one cause: enquiries arrive without context, are handled without differentiation and are followed up without a system. That is exactly where this playbook starts.

ECONOMIC FRICTION

What the current way of working really costs

Portal fees appear on an invoice. The more expensive items appear nowhere — four of them:

Interchangeability on the portal

Whoever only rents demand competes inside a listing view on position and response time. Your own visibility — and the relationship with owners before they decide to sell — is not built there.

Time spent on curiosity, not maturity

Valuation enquiries without any classification absorb exactly the hours that mature seller and buyer conversations would need. The diary is full — just not with the right appointments.

One bucket for everything

Seller and buyer enquiries land in the same process, although they need different questions, deadlines and next steps. The result: standard replies that serve nobody well.

Lost long-cycle opportunities

Owners decide over months, sometimes years. Without an owner within your team and a scheduled resubmission, you lose precisely the instructions that would have cost the least acquisition effort.

How much this amounts to in commission volume differs by market and portfolio — this playbook deliberately does not do that arithmetic for you. What matters is the pattern: it is not the number of enquiries that limits the business, but the number of prepared conversations that come out of them.

Where context gets lost along the way

From first contact to an instruction or buyer conversation, every enquiry passes through five stations. The leaks sit at the hand-offs:

Here too: every station can work in isolation. A decent portal profile, a hard-working team, a well-kept address book. The business is lost at the hand-offs — and those stay invisible as long as nobody measures them.

QUALITY CRITERIA

What a prepared conversation must show

Seller or buyer: a prepared conversation does not start from zero. Six things should be visible beforehand:

1

Occasion. Valuation, sale, purchase or information? The occasion sets the tone, the questions and the sensible next step.

2

Property or search profile. For an owner: which property, which location. For a buyer: search area, property type, rough size.

3

Motivation. Why now? A change in life circumstances, a need for capital, months of searching — the motive carries the conversation.

4

Timing. Zero to three months, three to six, later? Maturity decides priority — not how loudly the enquiry arrives.

5

Budget or decision signal. For buyers, budget fit and financing status as a self-assessment; for owners, the decision situation — does one person decide, or several?

6

A next step with a date and an owner. Call-back, valuation appointment, search-profile conversation, viewing — agreed and assigned to one person.

These six points are not an interrogation on the phone. Well-built enquiry paths capture them in passing — the enquirer experiences structure, not bureaucracy.

THE NOVALURE DIFFERENCE

Five principles for owned demand

NovaLure does not build “more leads” for brokerage teams — it builds a path: visibility, enquiry, qualification, follow-up and prepared conversations, as one connected process. Five principles make the difference:

1

Owned demand as a path, not a one-off push

A campaign ends; a path remains: your own visibility and enquiry routes that belong to the agency — alongside the portal, not against it.

2

Occasion before action

Valuation, sale and purchase are handled separately. A valuation enquiry is not an instruction — it is the start of a relationship with its own pace.

3

Maturity before speed

Not every enquiry needs an appointment straight away. It needs a classification — and the next step that fits its maturity.

4

A prepared reason to talk instead of a name and a number

You take over conversations that come with occasion, motivation, timing and an agreed next step — not raw contacts to sort.

5

Ownership and dates instead of memory

Every open opportunity has a responsible person and a scheduled follow-up step — even months ahead. That is how “later” owners remain your owners.

Behind the scenes, NovaLure uses an internal operating system to keep source, context, ownership, follow-up and the next step connected. You are not buying software — you are buying the outcome of a managed process: prepared conversations, structured handling and a documented handover into your existing way of working.

MINI SCORECARD

Where does your enquiry path stand?

Eight questions, three possible answers. What counts is the normal busy week — not the ideal case.

#	Question	Yes	Partly	No
1	Do you generate enquiries regularly through your own routes — independent of the portal?	☐	☐	☐
2	Is the occasion captured for every enquiry: valuation, sale, purchase, information?	☐	☐	☐
3	Do you know motivation and timing before the first conversation takes place?	☐	☐	☐
4	Do seller and buyer enquiries run in separate, fitting processes?	☐	☐	☐
5	Does every open enquiry have one responsible person?	☐	☐	☐
6	Does every open enquiry have a dated next step?	☐	☐	☐
7	Are “later” owners and buyers systematically resubmitted — across months?	☐	☐	☐
8	If one person were away, would the team know the next step for every opportunity?	☐	☐	☐

7–8 × Yes

Your enquiry path carries the weight.
The lever lies in expanding owned demand — not in repairs.

4–6 × Yes

There are structural gaps — usually in separating occasions and in resubmission. That is where silent losses occur.

0–3 × Yes

Your business depends on portals and memory. Every additional enquiry mainly increases the sorting work.

REFERENCE

A documented case from an active mandate

This is what the principle looks like in practice — documented from an active DACH mandate with GRASL Immobilien, Schwaz (Austria):

Starting point

Unfiltered contacts from various sources, no prioritisation, no predictable pipeline: work followed order of arrival and memory — not maturity and occasion.

What was built

A continuous lead path: enquiries with captured occasion and context, qualification, structured follow-up with ownership and dates — and a documented handover into the agency's own sales work.

Reference values

15–20 qualified enquiries per month and a commission volume of over EUR 110k from active mandates — with a predictable pipeline instead of gut feeling.

“We don't get contact lists — we get prepared conversations. That's the difference.”

SV Thomas Grasl · GRASL Immobilien, Schwaz

Reference values from one active DACH mandate (GRASL Immobilien, Schwaz) — not a guaranteed and not a typical result. Enquiry numbers and commission volume depend on market, portfolio, offer and budget and cannot be transferred to other agencies or markets.

PROJECT CHECK

What the Project Check examines

The Project Check is a focused 30-minute video call about your market area and your enquiry path — an assessment, not a sales presentation.

What we look at together

- Your visibility and enquiry sources — portal and owned routes
- Which context is captured at the point of enquiry today
- Separation of seller and buyer enquiries
- Follow-up: ownership, dates, resubmission
- How prepared conversations start today

What you bring

- Your market area and your focus
- Your current enquiry sources
- How enquiries are handled today
- The person who can decide

What you take away

- A clear view of your current enquiry path
- The two or three biggest bottlenecks
- An assessment of whether a structured build-up makes sense
- One clear next step

What the Check is not

- Not a free end-to-end strategy
- No guaranteed enquiry or completion figures
- Not a finished campaign plan
- Not a software offer

You receive the assessment whether or not a collaboration follows. For agents marketing developer projects, the Check is the right entry point too: the same path makes project sales predictable.

SUMMARY

The next step

1

Contacts are not the business. Prepared seller and buyer conversations are the business — enquiries are merely their raw material.

2

Occasion and maturity decide. Treat valuation curiosity, an intention to sell and a wish to buy the same, and you lose in all three places.

3

Follow-up is a system, not a talent. Ownership and dated next steps protect precisely the opportunities that cost the least acquisition effort.

Have your enquiry path checked — in 30 minutes.

No obligation, and concrete: you receive a clear assessment with the two or three biggest levers for your agency — not a sales presentation.
